The 8/25/43 issue of the "California Bruin" (100-235169) published by the Associated Students of the University of California, contained an editorial entitled "The Case of Frankie" which pertained to the craze about Frankie Sinatra. It stated that FBI Agents probably soon would be asking the question, "Do you sigh over Frankie Sinatra?" as a criterion of Americanism. One person had stated that the case of Frank Sinatra versus the American woman showed the best argument he could think of for not having women equality.

On 1/9/50 former [redacted] furnished information regarding James J. Tarantino, (92-6898) a friend of Frank Sinatra whom he had known in N.J. before going to Hollywood. In 1944 Tarantino and Barney Ross, ex-champion, started a theatrical weekly throwaway called "Hollywood Night Life." He quickly ran into financial difficulties and sought help from Sinatra's personal representative, Hank Sanicola. Sinatra then transferred $12,000 to Sanicola who put it into the publication.

One of Sinatra's musical publishing tie-ups had an office on Sunset Blvd. in Hollywood. According to informant Sinatra used this office for a hideaway. Sinatra at that time had an interest in a firm called Barton Music Company, which Sanicola operated for him. Informant said there were many stories concerning how Sinatra and Sanicola got together with Tarantino but he obtained most of his information from [redacted]

Sinatra would only appear at a Las Vegas club (believed to be the Dunes), an Atlantic City club owned by an old friend who started him in the entertainment business, (not identified) and the Copa Cabana in NY where he had obligations. Informant explained that these obligations dated from Sinatra's "emancipation" from Tommy Dorsey who once owned Sinatra to the extent that Sinatra only received 10% of his gross income. Sinatra got Frank Costello, nationally known racketeer, to obtain his release from Dorsey for $150,000. As a result Sinatra was obligated to the Sinatra syndicate and therefore worked at the Copa Cabana. Sinatra was reputed to be a possible runner for Lucky Luciano during his overseas visits and a couple of years ago they had been pictured together in newspapers in Cuba.
